

ABSTRACT

"There is abundant evidence that well developed crime prevention programs not only reduce crime and victimization but also improve neighborhood safety and support the long-term development of nations. The quality of life for everyone is improved by effective and responsible crime prevention. Long-term financial savings will be achieved through reducing the price of the formal criminal justice system as well as various associated societal expenses.

For the foreseeable future, cities will continue to experience the vast majority of the world's population growth. Urban populations are expected to increase by 2.1 billion people between 2000 and 2030, nearly equal the 2.2 billion people that will be added to the world's population.

Instability is unquestionably one of the biggest threats to the security of East African states, as seen by past events in Kenya and the rest of the area. Therefore, this document seeks to investigate the various causes, effects and other aspects of crime.
